The 'Third Pillar acquis' after the Treaty of Lisbon enters into force

Professor Steve Peers

Second version: 1 December 2009

Introduction

The entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon on 1 December 2009 has ended the 16-year life of the EU's 'third pillar', which concerned almost all Justice and Home Affairs matters from 1993-99, and policing and criminal law matters since then.

During these periods a large number of legal acts were adopted, and most of them are still in force as of 1 December 2009. Also, the Treaty of Amsterdam integrated the 'Schengen acquis' into the EU legal order, and much of this acquis (some of which concerns immigration law) is still in force too.

From 1 December on, EU measures concerning policing and criminal law will take the form of Regulations and Directives, subject to the normal effect of EU law (direct effect and supremacy) and the normal jurisdiction of the EU Court of Justice (in particular, references on the validity and interpretation of EU measures in this area from all courts and tribunals in all Member States, and the power of the Commission to sue Member States for infringement of the laws in this area). Any third pillar proposals not yet adopted by 30 November 2009 now have to be proposed again from scratch.

But what will happen to the third pillar measures adopted prior to the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon? The 'transitional protocol' to that Treaty tells us two things. First, there will be a five-year transitional period relating to the Court of Justice jurisdiction (ending 1 December 2014), in which the 'old' rules on that jurisdiction apply - meaning no infringement actions, and references only from the national courts of 17 Member States (all of the first 15 Member States except the UK, Ireland and Denmark, plus Latvia, Lithuania, Slovenia, Hungary and the Czech Republic).

Secondly, the old rules on the legal effect of third pillar measures (meaning no direct effect, and arguably no supremacy or damages liability - although the Court of Justice has not ruled on those issues) apply indefinitely.

However, the old rules on jurisdiction and legal effect cease to apply once a 'legacy' third pillar act is amended.

The annex to this analysis lists all of the 'legacy' third pillar acts which were adopted before the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon and are still in force, and all of the proposals for third pillar acts which lapsed when the Treaty of Lisbon entered into force.

Those third pillar measures which are no longer in force, because they have lapsed, or become obsolete, or have been repealed or annulled, are not generally listed. Some measures which will be repealed effective in the near future are mentioned, except for the Europol Convention and its protocols and implementing measures, since they will be repealed already as from 1 January 2010.

The annex also indicates which measures have been adopted but are not applicable yet - although the delay in their applicability does not alter the application of the transitional protocol (ie what matters is when the measures were adopted, not when they will start to apply).

It should be noted that a declaration to the Lisbon Treaty calls upon the EU institutions to transform the prior third pillar acts to new EU acts after the entry into force of the new Treaty, and the draft Stockholm programme also calls upon the Commission to submit a timetable to this effect for approval by the Council.

Any proposals made after the new Treaty is in force, even simply to convert old third pillar acts without amendment, will now be subject to the new Treaty's revised and extended rules on JHA opt-outs for the UK, Ireland and Denmark, as well as on decision-making on JHA matters (ie the Council will generally vote by qualified majority, the EP will generally have co-decision rights).

In some cases, the conversion of a Convention or Protocol into a new EU measure would mean that those measures would now apply to some Member States that had signed but not yet ratified the third pillar acts. In those cases, the effect of transforming the third pillar measure would go beyond changing the rules on ECJ jurisdiction and the legal effect of the measure.

The Annex also lists third pillar treaties which have come into force, or which were signed, before the Treaty of Lisbon came into force. Treaties already in force are presumably in the same position as legislation adopted before the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon, whereas treaties not yet concluded should arguably be treated the same way as pending legislative proposals now that the Treaty of Lisbon has entered into force.

Annex

A) Binding third pillar acts adopted - and still in force

1) Schengen acquis (integrated into EU legal order 1.5.1999) - [2000] OJ L 239

a) Schengen Convention:

Articles 39-45, 47-49, 51, 54-58, 71-72, 75-76, 82, 91-119, 126-30; also some provisions of Schengen accession treaties

Notes: Arts 92-119 have been amended by Decisions concerning the SIS in 2005 and 2008 (see below); they are repealed with effect from when the decision setting up SIS II (adopted in 2007, see below) becomes operational
