OVERVIEW

States must treat asylum-seekers and refugees according to the appropriate standards laid down in human rights and refugee law. The current migration crisis revealed wide divergences in the level of reception conditions provided by Member States. While some are facing problems in ensuring adequate and dignified treatment of applicants, in others the standards of reception provided are more generous. This has led to secondary movements of asylum-seekers and refugees and has put pressure on certain Member States.

The aim of the proposed recast directive, which would replace the current Reception Conditions Directive, is to ensure greater harmonisation of reception standards across all Member States. In doing so, applicants for asylum could experience similar treatment as regards reception conditions provided in EU Member States.

Ordinary legislative procedure (COD) (Parliament and Council on equal footing – formerly ‘co-decision’)

Next steps expected: Initial discussion in LIBE Committee
Introduction
Since the adoption of the European Agenda on Migration in May 2015, the European Commission has been implementing measures to complete the Common European Asylum System (CEAS). The system provides common minimum standards for the treatment of asylum-seekers and is based on rules determining the Member State responsible for examining an application for international protection (Dublin Regulation), common standards for asylum procedures (Asylum Procedures Directive), recognition and protection of beneficiaries of international protection (Qualification Directive) and reception conditions (Reception Conditions Directive).

In April 2016, the European Commission presented a communication on the CEAS, which identified some weaknesses, notably the different treatment of asylum-seekers across Member States. In order to address those differences and improve the functioning of the CEAS, the Commission adopted first and second packages of legislative proposals, including a revision of the Reception Conditions Directive. Its aim is, among others, to further harmonise reception conditions in the EU and thereby ensure more equal treatment of asylum-seekers, prevent asylum-seekers from moving between Member States, and avoid 'asylum shopping' whereby asylum-seekers choose the Member State with the highest protection standards for their application. This should ensure more even distribution of asylum-seekers across the EU.

Context
According to the recommendations on reception standards For asylum-seekers in the European Union, developed by the United Nations Refugee Agency (UNHCR), reception conditions refer to the treatment of asylum-seekers by a country from the moment they apply for asylum, and include access to information at the border, humane conditions in refugee centres, legal counselling, education, medical care, employment, timely asylum procedures, and freedom of movement. States can choose what forms and kinds of support they will offer to asylum-seekers. These may range from 'in kind' support, such as accommodation, food and health care, to financial payment or work permits to allow self-sufficiency. However, despite states’ wide discretionary powers, asylum-seekers’ human dignity and rights must be protected and their situation must, in all circumstances, be 'adequate for the country in which they have sought asylum'.

International and regional legal instruments oblige states to treat asylum-seekers and refugees in accordance with relevant human rights and refugee law standards. Article 25 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) recognises everyone’s right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of themselves and of their family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services. Article 11(1) of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) recognises the right of everyone to an adequate standard of living for themselves and their family, including adequate food, clothing and housing, and to the continuous improvement of living conditions. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) provides standards for the exercise of civil rights, including protection against arbitrary detention and torture, and the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.¹

The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union is one of the tools at EU level that protects asylum seekers’ human rights. Reception conditions should, among other things, be consistent with provisions relating to the prohibition of torture, inhuman or degrading treatment, the right to liberty and security, the right to privacy and family life, and the right to an effective remedy. In addition, the European Social Charter guarantees a broad range of human rights with respect to everyday essential needs related to employment and working conditions, housing, education, health, medical assistance and social protection.

Existing situation

Directive 2013/33/EU laying down standards for the reception of applicants for international protection

The current EU legislation that applies in the field is Directive 2013/33/EU. This directive, adopted on 26 June 2013 and applicable since 21 July 2015, is a recast of a previous Council Directive 2003/9/EC and aims at providing dignified and more harmonised standards of living of applicants for international protection in the EU. However, it allows Member States to introduce more favourable provisions as long as they are compatible with the Directive (Article 4).

The Directive applies to all third-country nationals and stateless persons who apply for international protection anywhere in the Member States, including at the border, in territorial waters or in transit zones (Article 3(1)). It applies during all stages and types of procedures concerning applications for international protection (Recital 8), including to asylum-seekers pending transfer under the Dublin Regulation.

The Directive ensures that applicants have access to material reception conditions, which include housing, food, clothing and a daily allowance (Article 2(g)), as well as access to health care, employment and medical and psychological care. It also provides grounds for Member States to reduce or, in exceptional and duly justified cases, withdraw those material reception conditions (Article 20).

The Directive also foresees clear rules and grounds for detention of applicants, according to which detention should be in line with fundamental rights, based on an individual assessment and only possible if other, less coercive alternative measures cannot be effectively applied (Article 8). It also restricts the detention of vulnerable persons, in particular minors (Article 11), and includes guarantees such as access to free legal assistance and information in writing when lodging an appeal against a detention order (Article 9). It also introduces specific reception conditions for detention facilities, such as access to fresh air and communication with lawyers, NGOs and family members (Article 10), and an obligation for Member States to take appropriate measures to prevent gender-based violence when providing accommodation (Article 18(4)).

The Directive includes an obligation for Member States to conduct an individual assessment to identify the special reception needs of vulnerable persons (Article 22). Member States shall pay particular attention to unaccompanied minors (Article 24) and victims of torture (Article 25) and ensure that vulnerable asylum-seekers can access psychological support. It also provides rules on the qualifications of the representatives of unaccompanied minors (Article 24).

To enhance self-sufficiency and integration, applicants for international protection have a right to access the labour market, at the latest nine months after lodging their application (Article 15(1)). Member States can, however, restrict access for reasons of labour market policy and give priority to Union citizens and EEA nationals, as well as legally resident third-country nationals (Article 15(2)).
The Directive does not apply to the Schengen associated states, or the United Kingdom (UK), Ireland and Denmark, although the UK continues to apply the 2003 Reception Conditions Directive.

Infringement procedures

Member States had to transpose the Directive and communicate their transposition measures by 20 July 2015. On 23 September 2015, the European Commission sent letters of formal notice to 19 Member States for neglecting to communicate the national measures taken to fully transpose the Reception Conditions Directive. On 10 February 2016, the Commission issued reasoned opinions against some Member States for failing to notify the Commission of their transposition measures, following the letters of formal notice sent in September 2015.

Situation in the Member States

While the current Directive provides for some degree of convergence between Member States’ standards as regards reception conditions for asylum-seekers, much divergence remains, resulting to some extent from the discretion current asylum legislation allows Member States in implementing the Directive, and from the pressure on the reception capacity in some Member States.

The EU Fundamental Rights Agency (FRA) provides regular updates on fundamental rights in Member States most affected by new arrivals. Its 2016 report states that increased number of arrivals of asylum-seekers put significant strain on domestic asylum systems in countries of first arrival, countries of transit, and the main countries of destination. The report mentions in particular: inadequate housing, such as overcrowded temporary facilities; desperate and deteriorating conditions at the borders; and overcrowded and inadequate reception facilities. Inadequate reception facilities in some Member States expose certain groups of asylum-seekers to risks of sexual and gender-based violence. The report also focuses on the specific needs of children, stating that children are often accommodated in adult facilities; that unaccompanied children continue to be detained; and that there are delays in appointing guardians.

A 2016 report prepared by the European Council on Refugees and Exiles (ECRE) as part of the asylum information database (AIDA), which documents the conditions for reception of refugees and asylum-seekers in 17 Member States, shows that considerable increase in the number of asylum-seekers has placed reception capacities under strain for the majority of Member States. Member States face difficulties in adapting to higher reception demand, shortage of reception space, substandard living conditions, overcrowding, and difficulties in opening up new reception places.

According to a 2016 study, commissioned by the European Parliament, reception conditions represent a very difficult field of harmonisation, as prospects in some Member States remain better than in others. The study shows that the reception conditions vary significantly between Member States, which triggers secondary movements and consequently prevents the implementation of any distribution mechanisms. In addition, there are also major challenges in terms of the number of reception places available in the Member States, which to some extent results from poor contingency planning and the failure to readily adapt to increasing reception needs.

A 2014 report by the European Migration Network (EMN) on the organisation of reception facilities for asylum-seekers in 23 Member States shows considerable differences between Member States in terms of type of facilities and actors involved in the provision of reception. In addition, although special reception needs for vulnerable persons are taken into account by Member States, there is wide diversity as to how those needs are satisfied in practice.

The case of Greece

Based on judgements of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) and the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU), which identified systemic deficiencies in the Greek asylum system, including in terms of reception conditions, in 2011 the Member States suspended the transfer of applicants to Greece under the Dublin Regulation. According to this Regulation, the country of arrival is, in most cases, identified as responsible for the asylum application. Greece remains the main EU country of first entry from the Eastern Mediterranean route and has come under pressure after the closure of the Western Balkans route. In addition, the relocation schemes, intended to relieve Greece of this pressure, have not yet been fully implemented by Member States. The European Commission issued several recommendations (the latest on 28 September 2016), in which it concluded that Greece still needs to make progress and should continue its efforts to ensure that reception conditions for asylum applicants meet the standards of the Reception Conditions Directive.

Parliament's starting position

In its Resolution of 6 July 2016, the European Parliament called for conditions to be created within the EU for well-managed reception of asylum-seekers that ensures their safety and humane treatment, paying particular attention to the needs of vulnerable groups. In its Resolution of 5 July 2016, the Parliament called on the Commission to consider a targeted revision of the Reception Conditions Directive to ensure that applicants of international protection have access to the labour market as soon as possible after their applications are lodged. Parliament also stressed, in its Resolution of 12 April 2016, that harmonisation of reception conditions and asylum procedures can avoid putting pressure on countries offering better conditions, and are crucial for responsibility sharing.

Preparation of the proposal

The Reception Conditions Directive adopted in 2013 provides for minimum harmonisation of standards for the reception of asylum applicants. Reception conditions nevertheless vary considerably among Member States, both in terms of how the system is organised and in terms of standards provided. The current migration crisis revealed that reception conditions between Member States must be more consistent and that Member States must be better prepared to deal with a disproportionate influx of migrants.

In view of improving the functioning of the CEAS, including in terms of reception standards for asylum applicants, the European Commission carried out exchanges of views in April and June 2016 with the Civil Liberties, Justice and Home Affairs Committee (LIBE) and other stakeholders.

In spring 2016, the European Asylum Support Office (EASO) conducted a mapping exercise on behalf of the Commission collecting Member States’ and Associates States’ data on their approach to reception conditions. The resulting thematic report, which is for internal use and serves as a basis for developing EASO guidance on reception standards and indicators to facilitate the application of certain provisions of the current Directive, provided an input to the new proposal.
The changes the proposal would bring

The proposal for a recast of the Reception Conditions Directive, presented on 13 July 2016, introduces substantial changes with the aim of further harmonising reception conditions in the EU, reducing incentives for secondary movements, and increasing applicants’ self-reliance and prospects for integration.

Article 17(a) thus establishes that applicants are not entitled to material reception conditions (excluding necessary health care and subsistence and basic needs) when they are irregularly present in a Member State other than the one in which they are required to be present. In connection to this provision, the proposal requires Member States, where necessary, to assign applicants a residence in a specific place (Article 7) and link that residence to the right to material reception conditions (Article 7(2)). On this basis, Member States shall, where necessary, oblige applicants to regularly report to the authorities in case of risk of absconding (Article 7(3)).

The definition of family members in Article 2(3) and of material reception conditions in Article 2(7) are extended and include family relations formed after leaving the country of origin but before arrival on the territory of the Member State and non-food items, such as sanitary items, respectively.

As regards unaccompanied minors, Member States must, within five working days, assign a guardian to represent and assist those minors (Article 23). This is consistent with the EP’s desire to protect and fulfil the needs of vulnerable groups.

The detention of applicants continues to be justified only when it proves necessary, based on individual assessment and if other, less coercive, alternative measures cannot be applied effectively. However, according to the proposal, applicants may be detained if they do not reside in the assigned place and when there is a risk they might abscond (Article 8(3)(c)).

The time limit for access to the labour market is reduced from nine to six months from lodging the application, when a decision on the asylum application has not been taken (Article 15(1)(1)). Member States can grant access no later than three months if the application is well-founded, and can refuse access if the application is likely to be unfounded (Article 15(1)(2)). The proposal also foresees that, after receiving access to the labour market, applicants should be entitled to equal treatment with nationals of Member States (Article 15(3)) in terms of working conditions, education and vocational training, freedom of association and affiliation, recognition of professional qualifications and social security. Member States can however limit those rights as regards family benefits and unemployment benefits.

The proposal also requires Member States to take reception standards and indicators developed by EASO (Article 27) into account and to draw up and update contingency plans to ensure adequate reception in cases of disproportionate pressure (Article 28).

Advisory committees

The employment, social affairs and citizenship (SOC) section of the European Economic and Social Committee is to discuss the draft opinion on the second CEAS reform package, including the recast Reception Conditions Directive, at the end of November 2016. The draft opinion is planned for adoption at the Committee’s December 2016 plenary session.

The Committee of the Regions has not yet started work on the draft opinion.
National parliaments
Half of the Member States’ national parliaments have initiated a process of scrutiny. The Italian Senate sent a reasoned opinion, stating a violation of the subsidiarity and proportionality principles, while the Czech Senate and Romanian Chamber of Deputies have initiated political dialogue with the Commission over their concerns with the proposal.

The deadline for the subsidiarity check in national parliaments was 10 November 2016.

Stakeholders' views
This section aims to provide a flavour of the debate and is not intended to be an exhaustive account of all different views on the proposal. Additional information can be found in related publications listed under ‘EP supporting analysis’.

In April 2015, UNHCR issued comments regarding certain provisions of the current directive. The UN Refugee Agency welcomed the guarantees and procedural safeguards concerning detention, vulnerable people and applicants with special reception needs, which have also been maintained in the new proposal. UNHCR also issued recommendations, which the Commission took into account in the current proposal, such as that access to the labour market be granted within six months following the date the application was lodged and that Member States should recognise relationships that were formed during or after flight, among others.

UNHCR also expressed several concerns regarding provisions, which have been left unchanged in the current proposal. They include the possibility to detain an applicant for international protection in order to decide on his right to enter the territory, provisions that Member States may, for reasons of labour market policies, give priority to legally resident third-country nationals and that they may reduce, or withdraw in exceptional cases, reception conditions in the event of a subsequent application.

As regards the current proposal, the European Council on Refugees and Exiles (ECRE) issued similar observations. It stated that provisions on exclusion of applicants who engage in secondary movements from an entitlement to reception conditions, and punitive restrictions in case of non-compliance with obligations, should be deleted. According to ECRE, several existing and proposed grounds for detention are incompatible with the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights, and the detention of persons with special reception needs should be explicitly prohibited. The organisation, however, welcomed the introduction of contingency plans as well as the improvements of the mechanism for identification of special reception needs.

The Robert Schuman Foundation stresses that harmonisation of reception conditions, as foreseen by the proposal, might not necessarily prevent secondary movements, as these are often the result of the existence of established diaspora and Member States’ varying degrees of economic attractiveness.

While the Migration Policy Group sees some positive developments for integration of applicants, the proposal’s sanction system is said to risk delaying and categorically excluding potentially large numbers of asylum-seekers from receiving integration support.

International Rehabilitation Council for Torture Victims issued comments on the proposed directive, focusing on applicants with special needs. It expresses concerns regarding sanctions for those who do not comply with obligations and regarding restrictions or withdrawal of reception conditions. It states that torture victims must be exempt from detention and that applicants with special reception needs should always have access to full reception conditions, including rehabilitation. It also supports the obligation for systematic and timely assessment of special reception needs.

Legislative process

The legislative proposal (COM(2016) 465) was published on 13 July 2016. It falls under the ordinary legislative procedure (2016/0222(COD)). In the European Parliament, the proposal has been assigned to the LIBE Committee where initial discussions are to be held, before the rapporteur (Sophia in ’t Veld, ALDE, the Netherlands) publishes a draft report.
