Throughout the text, hyperlinks are embedded to sources of information that are available in the public domain.

In view of the increasing numbers of refugees, asylum seekers and migrants entering the EU, the EU Agency for Fundamental Rights has been collecting relevant data since November 2015. These focus on the fundamental rights situation of people arriving in Member States particularly affected by large migration movements. The countries covered are: Austria, Bulgaria, Croatia, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Italy, the Netherlands, Poland, Spain and Sweden. This report addresses fundamental rights concerns between 1 December 2017 and 31 January 2018.

Key fundamental rights concerns

Key emerging fundamental rights concerns

In harsh winter conditions including heavy snowfall, an increasing number of people in need of protection crossed from Italy to France via a new route across the mountains in the Region of Piedmont to reach Briançon. The municipality of Bardonecchia in Italy set up an emergency night shelter at the railway station, where volunteers provided basic medical assistance and warned migrants about the risks of the journey.

At the end of January, authorities in Hungary reduced the daily cap on people admitted into the transit zones – which FRA visited in December – from ten persons to only two (one in each transit zone), NGOs reported and the Prime Minister's Office confirmed. This may result in even longer waiting periods – up to years – for people stranded in Serbia.

In the Netherlands, long waiting periods for family reunification emerged as an issue. Applications were examined over an average of 319 days, instead of the six-month period prescribed by law. According to media reports, despite a backlog, the Ministry of Security and Justice reduced the staff working on these cases in September 2017; 6,600 applications were pending in December 2017.

Key persisting fundamental rights concerns

One year after Italy and Libya signed an agreement on migration and border control, Médecins Sans Frontières and other NGOs voiced concerns about its implementation given the critical conditions for migrants in Libya.

In the Greek hotspots in Lesbos, Samos and Chios, progress has been made in terms of preparing overcrowded Reception and Identification Centres for winter and increasing their capacity, but not sufficiently so. In a joint statement, 12 humanitarian NGOs criticised the slow transfer of asylum seekers to the mainland. More than 3,800 asylum seekers eligible for family reunification under the Dublin Regulation have been waiting for over six months to depart for Germany, as reported by the Ecumenical Refugee Program of the Church of Greece.

In Hungary, police continued to escort all migrants in an irregular situation apprehended in the country to the outer side of the border fence, without fingerprinting or registering them. Xenophobic attitudes persisted, although most citizens have never met asylum seekers or irregular migrants. For example, locals of Cegléd called the police when an Arab tourist group travelled through their town. In Szekszárd, the mayor claimed that “somebody is making preparations to help migrants settle in town”.

In Croatia, allegations of pushbacks at the border continued. According to the Croatian Law Center, other concerns relate to long asylum procedures (which can take more than a year), the complex procedure for family reunification, a lack of appropriate reception conditions for vulnerable groups, and gaps in the guardianship system for unaccompanied children.

According to the State Agency for Refugees, Bulgarian municipalities remained reluctant to integrate persons granted international protection. The State Agency for Refugees also reported that unaccompanied children were still not adequately represented and did not receive the support needed. The new legal rules on the representation of unaccompanied children who have not applied for international protection or whose applications were rejected will enter into force in June 2018.

Poland continued to refuse entry to asylum seekers at the Terespol and Medyka land border crossing points. In December 2017, only 100 people lodged asylum claims, according to the Headquarters of the Border Guard – the lowest monthly figure in 2017. Furthermore, due to poorly functioning procedures to identify and refer asylum seekers and other migrants who had been victims of violence, many of them continued to end up in detention, although this is prohibited by Polish law.

The two-year suspension of family reunification for beneficiaries of subsidiary protection in Germany will be prolonged until July 2018. According to the proposed coalition agreement between the conservative Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and the Social Democratic Party (SPD), as of August 2018, every month, 1,000 family members of beneficiaries of subsidiary protection will be admitted for family reunification. The criteria for the selection process are unclear, according to media reports.

The situation of asylum seekers and irregular migrants in France deteriorated. The Public Defender of Rights criticised the general climate of suspicion towards foreigners. Tensions between migrants and law enforcement authorities in the informal camps in northern France remained high, which led to a number of serious incidents, the NGO ‘Service centre for the migrants in Calais’ reported.

The situation of people arriving irregularly in Spain by sea remained critical. According to the Ministry of Interior, this concerned more than 22,100 people in 2017 – almost triple the number of that in 2016. According to media reports and the Spanish Refugee Aid Commission, some 223 people died last year and 75 have already lost their lives trying to cross the Mediterranean Sea to reach Spain this year. According to the Jesuit Migrant Service, UNHCR, the Spanish Ombudsman and the Spanish Refugee Aid Commission, newcomers faced difficulties in accessing the asylum procedure. Furthermore, the identification and treatment of vulnerable people, such as children, women or victims of trafficking, was inappropriate.

The law in Sweden imposing temporary restrictions on granting residence permits to refugees and limiting family reunification affects the mental health of the persons concerned, and their ability to integrate into society, according to the National Board of Health and Welfare and several NGOs. Several NGOs pointed out further persisting concerns. These included returning to Afghanistan unaccompanied children and young adults who have had their age re-registered or who turned 18 before receiving their negative asylum decision. Similarly, the police reported that the increasing number of migrants who stay in the country in an irregular situation after their asylum claims have been rejected remained a major concern.

In Finland, inadequate mental health services at the reception centres due to a lack of resources was a key persistent problem.

Authorities in Denmark continued to withdraw, and refused to renew, residence permits of Somalis granted asylum because Denmark considers Somalia to be a safe return destination, which was criticised by civil society organisations and experts.

In the Netherlands, authorities continued to grant hardly any residence permits under the children's amnesty procedure (Kinderpardon), according to the Dutch Council for Refugees. This procedure foresees granting, under certain conditions, residence permits to children whose asylum claims have been rejected and who have lived in the country for at least five years. In December, a group of famous Dutch persons launched a campaign calling for a more lenient implementation of the procedure.

Situation at the border

Austria, Denmark, France, Germany and Sweden plan to maintain internal border controls until April or May 2018.

The Hungarian police prevented 1,061 people from crossing the border into Hungary in December and January, the National Headquarters of the Police reported. This was a significant decrease from the previous monthly figures (1,114 people in November 2017 alone). This involved people who attempted to enter Hungary in an irregular manner, most frequently through the fence alongside the border with Serbia, and who were apprehended either by the police or the army.

According to the Ombudsperson and UNHCR, Croatian police continued to force asylum seekers back to Serbia and Bosnia and Herzegovina, in some cases using violence, without giving them an opportunity to lodge claims for international protection. For example, a Syrian national who had allegedly been subject to abuse and sexual exploitation was pushed back to Bosnia and Herzegovina although the police was informed about his vulnerability, the Croatian Law Center reported. A 6-year-old Afghani girl, who had already applied for asylum with her family in Croatia, lost her life after a train hit her at the border between Croatia and Serbia. According to media reports, the police had allegedly instructed the family to follow the railroad tracks back to Serbia, instead of processing the asylum application.

The situation along the French-Italian border (especially in the Department Alpes-Maritimes) remained problematic. Authorities in France continued to send several migrants back to Italy without a formal decision and denied them the possibility to apply for asylum, the NGOs ANAFE and GISTI reported. This practice has increasingly pushed migrants seeking safety to take risks, as a result of which two deadly accidents were reported (one in Roquebrune-Cape-Martin and one in Menton).

Asylum procedure

Trends

According to EASO, in 2017, the overall number of asylum applications in the EU+ countries (28 EU Member States plus Norway and Switzerland) decreased by 43 % compared to 2016. At the same time, applications for international protection increased in France, Greece, Italy and Spain over the last year, although in December asylum applications in Italy dropped to some 5,220 (compared to some 8,495 in November and 9,900 in October), according to Eurostat. In Austria, Bulgaria, Croatia, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Hungary, Poland and Sweden numbers in December continued to decrease.

France registered a historical record number of asylum applications in 2017 (more than 100,000 claims), which represents a 17 % increase compared to 2016, according to the French asylum authority (OFPRA). To process the exceptionally high number of asylum applications and to reduce the backlog, the authorities resorted to accelerated asylum procedures in roughly one third of all cases.

In Spain, the number of asylum applicants continued to rise. In October 2017, the number of applications for asylum in 2017 had already increased by 64 % (25,845) compared to the previous year (15,755).

In the Netherlands, the total number of asylum applications remained at a similar level in 2017 compared to 2016. However, there was a slight increase in December 2017.

Access to asylum procedures

The Italian Legal Network for Transiting Migrants published a report about difficulties asylum seekers faced when applying for protection between April and October 2017. According to the report, police officers at the Police Headquarters in Rome required proof of stay to register applications. The Police Headquarters only accepted some 20 applications per day, sometimes selecting applicants based on their nationality.

In Croatia, the asylum procedure can take more than one year and there is a lack of sufficiently qualified interpreters, the Croatian Law Center reported. The competent department of the Ministry of Interior underwent structural changes that led to a decrease in the quality of the asylum procedure. According to the Croatian Law Center, many negative decisions provided only general copy-pasted reasons for the rejection without assessing the individual case. The Croatian Law Center, an institution sponsored by UNHCR Croatia, is the only institution in the country providing support to newcomers in accessing international protection. In December 2017, only three persons contacted them and sought information (none did so in January 2018). However, they did not apply for asylum in the end, as they were allegedly afraid to go to the police to do so.

The authorities in Hungary continued to decide on the admission of asylum seekers stranded in Serbia to the transit zones on the basis of so-called "waiting lists". These are compiled by the Serbian Commissariat for Refugees, in cooperation with volunteering community leaders. Currently one person is admitted to each transit zone per day.

In Bulgaria, the State Agency for Refugees stated that they continued to experience difficulties in recruiting qualified interpreters for Kurdish, Arabic, Persian and Dari languages.

In Poland, no systematic legal assistance was provided to asylum seekers in detention centres and open reception facilities due to the continuing lack of funding, as several NGOs pointed out. (The Polish authorities have not announced calls under the EU Asylum, Migration and Integration Fund for a while.)

The Austrian Ombudsmen Board reported a significant drop in complaints against the duration of asylum procedures. At the same time, as the NGO Caritas Vienna reported, the quality of interviews at the Federal Office for Alien Matters and Asylum (first instance authority in asylum proceedings) declined, as caseworkers felt pressure to conduct a minimum number of interviews per week.

NGOs continued to note significant delays (three months on average) in accessing the asylum procedure in France, particularly in certain departments. The Ministry of the Interior issued a circular to reduce the waiting period to lodge an asylum application to 10 days by mid-2018, and then to three days by the end of the year.

Asylum seekers in Spain faced different challenges in accessing the asylum system. For example, authorities did not sufficiently inform newly arriving migrants about their possibility to apply for asylum, in particular in Ceuta and Melilla, according to a report of the Spanish Refugee Aid Commission.

The staff of the Swedish Migration Agency voiced criticism of several shortcomings related to the asylum procedure. The procedure was described as neither legally secure, uniform or predictable, nor sustainable due to, among others, the lack of support and training offered to the staff.

The Refugee Advice Center in Finland was particularly concerned about the lack of adequate legal aid services, especially for asylum seekers who lodged subsequent asylum applications.

Relocation and resettlement

As of January 2018, 21,726 asylum seekers had been relocated from Greece to other EU Member States, mainly to Germany, France, the Netherlands and Sweden. Finland, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxemburg, Malta and Sweden, as well as Norway, Switzerland and Ireland have fully complied with their obligations under the temporary relocation scheme, according to the Greek government and the International Organization for Migration.

Asylum seekers in Italy complained about not receiving information regarding their relocation eligibility, as the Legal Network for Transiting Migrants reported.

Due to the delayed formation of a government, Germany has not yet offered places for the resettlement of refugees from UNHCR camps in North Africa and the Middle East in 2018. France announced intentions to resettle some 10,000, and Sweden some 8,750 people, from these camps.

In December 2017, the Ministry of the Interior confirmed that Finland would receive Syrian refugees from Turkey and Congolese refugees from Zambia under its refugee quota of 750 persons for 2018.

Return procedure

Returns to Afghanistan continued at least from Austria, Bulgaria, Denmark, Finland, Germany, the Netherlands and Sweden.

In Hungary, rejected asylum seekers subject to return decisions either remained in the transit zones or were transferred to closed detention centres pending their removal, the Ministry of Interior stated.

According to the Ombudspersons Office, police stations at the Eastern border of Croatia recorded only some 150 asylum applications, while 1,100 persons were returned to Serbia or Bosnia and Herzegovina. All decisions on expulsion had the same non-individualised wording. As no interpreter was available, procedures were held in English.

The forced return of a well-integrated Chechen family triggered significant media attention in Austria. The family had applied for asylum in Austria in 2011, received a final negative decision in 2015, and applied for residence on humanitarian grounds, which was still pending at the time of the removal. A number of supporters protested for the family's right to stay, and over 3,700 people signed an online-petition but could not prevent the removal.

In Sweden, Save the Children and the Swedish Red Cross voiced concerns about the lack of individualised assessments of the situation of individuals if returned. As of 1 January 2018, a new legislative amendment designated the Swedish Migration Agency as the entity carrying out the forced return monitoring under the Return Directive (Directive 2008/115/EC). As the Swedish Migration Agency is also responsible for issuing return decisions, it remains to be seen whether this arrangement will be compatible with the requirement of an "effective" forced return monitoring system under the Return Directive.

The asylum centre in Avnstrup, Denmark will be converted into a return centre for rejected asylum seekers, with the aim to speed up the return procedure.

Dutch authorities deported a rejected asylum seeker to Sudan, not applying an unofficial moratorium on deportations to Sudan, which had lasted for more than three years. According to media reports, the deported person was allegedly detained for hours immediately after arriving in Sudan, and is obliged to report to the headquarters of the security apparatus in Khartoum on a daily basis. Dozens of Sudanese and Dutch activists protested against deportations to Sudan.

Reception

Reception capacity

Sufficient reception capacity was available in Austria, Bulgaria, Croatia, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Hungary, Netherlands, Poland and Sweden.

Reception capacity remained inadequate in France, Greece and in parts of Italy and Spain.

Reception capacity in France has been increased to 80,000 places, and the Ministry of the Interior intends to further expand the overall capacity by 7,500 additional places by 2019. However, overall reception capacity still remained insufficient, as close to 110,000 asylum applicants remained in need of accommodation, GISTI and La Cimade reported. Authorities continued to take – sometimes violent – evacuation measures against reappearing informal camps in the north of France (at Calais and Grande-Synthe, with several hundreds of people living there), NGOs reported.

On the Greek islands, the Reception and Identification Centres in the hotspots of Lesbos, Samos and Chios remained overcrowded and continued to face difficulties in hosting new arrivals.

The Italian Legal Network for Transiting Migrants reported that there was insufficient reception capacity in Rome in 2017, which resulted in many people staying on the streets. According to the Italian Chamber of Deputies' Inquiry Commission on the Reception, Identification, and Expulsion System, the main problem with reception in Italy was, however, not the capacity of the facilities but the fact that people had to stay in the Extraordinary Reception Centres (Centri di Accoglienza Straordinaria - CAS) coordinated by local prefectures instead of the local reception centres in the framework of the Protection System for Asylum Seekers and Refugees (SPRAR) network. CAS centres are generally located in the outskirts of the cities, with poor connections to local society and generally hosting high numbers of asylum seekers; these centres include former military facilities. By contrast, SPRAR centres are smaller, managed by local stakeholders and more connected to the local community.

Reception facilities in Spain remained overcrowded, according to the Chair of Refugees and Forced Migrants of Comillas.

Reception conditions

Reception conditions in the hotspots of Pozzallo and Taranto, Italy, slightly improved, but key concerns persist. For example, in Pozzallo, more places and a playroom were built, hot water and toilets were restored, and the food was improved. The hotspot of Taranto still consisted of tents, in which people stayed on average well beyond 72 hours, the Senate Commission reported. In Lampedusa, reception conditions were still unsatisfactory: compounds and toilets were run-down, and there were no common areas, such as dining rooms or play areas for children. A positive development was the presence of a representative of the National Institute for Health, Migration and Poverty in the hotspots, applying a multidisciplinary approach for age assessments of children.

In Greece, in the hotspots on the islands of Chios and Samos, several people – including families with very small children – were living in tents without heating and faced harsh weather conditions. Protests against inadequate reception conditions took place in the Reception and Identification Centre in Lesbos and Chios, leaving several injured. In Chios, residents blocked the government's efforts to expand the Reception and Identification Centre with additional prefabricated housing units.

Reception and integration services for some 40 persons who were resettled in Zadar, Croatia were insufficient, according to the Jesuit Refugee Service.

The French Ministry of the Interior issued a circular aiming to check the legal status of foreigners staying in emergency accommodation and identify those in an irregular situation. The Public Defender of Rights condemned this new practice, underlining that the only criteria to provide emergency accommodation is the vulnerability of the persons concerned, regardless of their legal or migratory status. Civil society organisations filed court actions to have the circular annulled, according to GISTI.

Asylum seekers in Spain had no place to stay until they formally registered their asylum claim; it can take up to five months to get an appointment at the Asylum and Refugee Office, according to the NGO La Merced Migraciones. The Ministry of the Interior discontinued the use of Archidona, a newly built prison, as a pre-removal facility after the Spanish Ombudsman and others questioned the prison-like conditions of the centre and started investigations into alleged suicide by one of the inmates.

Vulnerable persons

In Greece, the NGO Médecins Sans Frontières (MSF) opened a mobile clinic in Moria (Lesvos) for pregnant women and children under 16 years of age, to provide primary health care and treat cold weather-related diseases among the most vulnerable population. MSF announced that they would also increase access to mental health care in Lesbos in response to the growing needs.

In some cases, vulnerable people (e.g. persons with disabilities, pregnant women, and the elderly) initially admitted to the Hungarian transit zones were transferred to open reception centres. However, authorities continued to seemingly randomly select those who may leave the transit zone to be placed in open facilities, UNHCR reported.

Reception centres in Croatia did not respect procedural and reception guarantees for vulnerable people as prescribed by law, the Croatian Law Center stated. No identification procedures, interpreters or specialised support services for victims of torture, trauma or human trafficking, people with mental health problems or addictions were available, according to the Centre for Peace Studies. Asylum seekers in need of a psychiatrist were referred to a remote hospital and when asylum seekers attempted suicide, they were hospitalised for one or two days and then returned to the Reception Centre without any further support, according to the Society for Psychological Assistance.

The Bulgarian Ombudsperson reported that there was still a shortage of qualified psychologists to support vulnerable persons. Some reception centres were still lacking accessible infrastructure for persons with disabilities. According to the State Agency for Refugees, specialised care facilities and support services for victims of torture or trauma remained unavailable.

In Finland, the number of registered self-harm cases has more than doubled compared to 2016, from 140 to over 300 cases, according to a media report in the Helsingin Sanomat. Some 35–40 % of the cases have been registered as attempted suicides, 50 % as self-inflicted violence, and 10 % as threats of self-injury.

Child protection

Figures and trends

As of 31 December 2017, according to the National Centre for Social Solidarity, some 3,350 unaccompanied children were estimated to be in Greece. A total of 2,290 were on waiting lists for appropriate shelter. Some of them remained in completely inadequate facilities, including 438 in Reception and Identification Centres (hotspots) and 54 in protective custody – not considered adequate accommodation for children. The total number of available places for unaccompanied children in all of Greece was 1,101 at year's end. These figures demonstrate a persisting protection gap over the past months.

By 31 January, 407 unaccompanied children had arrived in Italy in 2018, according to the Ministry of the Interior.

Reception

According to media reports, many children in Ventimiglia, Italy lacked adequate accommodation – living in informal camps in appalling conditions or hosted in the local reception centre together with adult asylum seekers. In Sicily, the NGO 'Terres des Hommes' reported that some children who arrived from Libya in extremely poor psychological and physical condition had to wait up to 13 months in local first reception centres before being transferred to child-specific reception centres.

A lack of specialised facilities and translators were the main fundamental rights concerns regarding unaccompanied children in Croatia, according to the Ombudsperson's Office. Access to education significantly improved when the authorities made it possible for children without Personal Identification Numbers (PIN/OIB) to formally enrol in schools.

Despite the decreasing numbers of unaccompanied children in Germany, the quality of accommodation and care still needed improvement, especially in the field of child care and in the assistance for young adults, according to a survey of the Federal Association for Unaccompanied Minor Refugees.

Inadequacies in child protection persisted in France. These include limited resources, not allowing support to be provided to all children; the lack of accommodation for some; and the often insufficient support received from guardians, the Public Defender of Rights pointed out. Ending child protection support when a child turns 18 can cause hardship and create feelings of hopelessness. In an extreme case, a young migrant in Paris committed suicide when he stopped receiving child welfare support after his 18th birthday.

In Sweden, the housing provided for unaccompanied children has been converted into a new type of accommodation called 'supported housing' in many municipalities. However, it does not provide the same support and supervision from qualified staff, the National Board of Health and Welfare pointed out. In addition, it remained difficult to find adequate housing for girls and to meet their special needs.

Guardianship for unaccompanied children

In Hungary, the authorities continued to assign child protection guardians only to unaccompanied children under the age of 14, who are placed in a children's home. Unaccompanied children over 14 were still placed in the Röszke transit zone until their asylum claims are decided upon, FRA observed. They are considered to have full legal capacity, so only have a formal representative for the asylum procedure, as FRA found during its visit to the transit zones.

In Croatia, sufficient guardians were available for all unaccompanied children. In 2017, the Social Welfare Centre appointed some 480 special guardians for 334 unaccompanied children, according to the Ministry of Demography, Family, Youth and Social Policy. However, many of the guardians lacked professional qualifications, according to the Ombudsperson Office for Children. To address these gaps, the Croatian Law Centre gives advice and training for special guardians as part of the project "Together in protection of unaccompanied children", which started in November 2017 and will last until December 2018.

Safeguards and specific support measures

In Italy, the Authority for the protection of detained people recommended applying a multi-disciplinary approach to age assessments of unaccompanied migrant children. This involves methods besides only x-raying the wrist to avoid unlawful returns of children due to a wrong assessment.

The Ombudsperson Office in Croatia urged the Ministry of the Interior to investigate allegations made against the Croatian police, who were said to have turned back children at borders without letting them claim asylum.

On 22 January 2018, the Administrative Court of Nice (France) delivered a ruling condemning the summary return of a 12-year-old Eritrean unaccompanied migrant child to Italy (Ventimiglia). Given that the return was implemented in breach of French law, the court required the French authorities to contact their Italian counterparts for the issuance, within three days, of the necessary travel documents allowing the child to return to France. The court also called on the French authorities to promptly appoint a guardian and to provide the child with all the necessary information about the possibility to apply for international protection.

In Greece, the EU Agency for Fundamental Rights, in cooperation with the European Asylum Support Office, provided capacity building training for child protection staff of the Reception and Identification Service in December 2017 and January 2018 in all hotspots, with the exception of Leros. The training addressed practical challenges for the protection of unaccompanied children in hotspots. These challenges include age assessment, missing children, reception conditions, guardianship and accessing schools. The Greek government announced an imminent language and cultural education training programme for children of 15-18 years of age, covering 5,000 people in total this year. These children will first undertake fast-track language courses for a smoother transition into formal education.

Age assessments remained of poor quality in the Hungarian transit zones. These continued to be very short and superficial (focusing on the wisdom teeth and the maturity of the body), and the benefit of the doubt has not been applied, NGOs reported. Children placed in the transit zones have had access to basic education (mainly Hungarian and English language courses) since mid-September 2017, according to the Office of Immigration and Asylum. Theoretically, all children under 16 years of age are obliged to go to school. However, the asylum authorities have not actually enforced this, civil society organisations reported.

According to Caritas Bulgaria, the Ministry of Education and Science (Министерство на образованието и науката) approved a new training curriculum for children, which will provide additional Bulgarian language classes for asylum-seeking children and children granted international protection in school. NGOs continued to organise educational and recreational activities.

According to a survey of the Federal Association for Unaccompanied Minor Refugees, 58 % of professionals working with unaccompanied children in Germany said that children often or always reported having suffered maltreatment, force and abuse in their countries of origin and on their transit routes to the EU.

The Spanish Ombudsman started to investigate the death of two children in child reception centres in Melilla, according to media reports. One of the boys was seventeen years old and had allegedly suffered several incidents of cardiorespiratory arrest.

The National Board of Health and Welfare and Amnesty International reported that, in Sweden, although the asylum authorities are obliged to carry out an overall assessment of the unaccompanied child's situation in each individual case, the views of the social services who were in daily contact with the children were not taken into consideration in the decision-making process. The methods used for medical age assessments, carried out by the National Board of Forensic Medicine, remained unchanged and thus problematic, NGOs reported.

According to the Danish Refugee Council, authorities did not process the asylum application of some 30 unaccompanied children as they did not consider them mature enough for the asylum procedure. The authorities would also not grant them a residence permit as unaccompanied children because they still had family in their countries of origin. The Danish Immigration Service eventually reassessed the intellectual maturity of several of the children and granted asylum to four who were considered mature enough.

In the Netherlands, the State Secretary for Justice and Security rejected the Mayor of Amersfoort's appeal regarding the return of a five-year-old boy with Down's syndrome to Iraq. The State Secretary for Justice and Security decided not to use its discretionary powers to issue a residence permit to the child and his family.

Missing children

Between 1 December 2017 and 21 January 2018, 33 children went missing during the asylum procedure in Denmark, according to the Danish Immigration Service.

In Sweden, 1,353 unaccompanied children went missing in 2017; and 191 did so during the reporting period, according to Save the Children. Authorities have made few efforts to reduce this number or to trace missing children, NGOs pointed out.

Practical and legal challenges to family reunification in Germany were among the main reasons for unaccompanied children to "disappear", as they planned to look for their relatives on their own, according to a survey.

In Spain, the Ministry of the Interior reported 2,341 complaints about missing children in 2017, of whom approximately 85 % were foreigners.

Immigration detention

In early January 2018, seven Italian NGOs – including the Italian Refugees Council – started implementing five cooperation projects in Libya, funded with some two million Euro by the Ministry of the Interior. The NGOs will provide assistance and support to detained migrants and training for Libyan staff employed in three detention centres in Libya.

The total number of people held in pre-removal detention in Greece was 4,360 (including 78 unaccompanied children as of the end of December 2017), according to the data of the Hellenic Police Headquarters. As reported by the NGO "ARSIS", there has been a rise in the number of children held in pre-removal detention in Greece, and the length of their detention has also increased (with an average detention time between one and two-and-a-half months). Some of these children were held for a long time at the Korinthos pre-departure centre and police stations before being sent to the Amygdaleza facility, where conditions were reportedly very poor.

In Hungary, pre-removal detention was ordered against 49 people, while asylum detention was ordered against only one single man, according to the Office of Immigration and Asylum and the National Headquarters of the Police.

During the reporting period in Croatia, 40 immigrants were detained, including a girl who had been a trafficking victim. She was detained for five weeks before being transferred to the Centre for missing and abused children, according to the Jesuit Refugee Service.

In Bulgaria, 229 persons were placed in pre-removal detention, the majority coming from Afghanistan, Pakistan, Iraq and Syria, the Ministry of the Interior stated. The detention facility in Elhovo was closed due to poor living conditions and lack of funding. Therefore, the overall capacity of detention facilities decreased from 940 to 700 places, according to the Ministry of the Interior.

The Children's Rights Ombudsman in Poland announced intentions to start investigations concerning immigration detention of children and the practical impact of recent legislative amendments relating to migrant children, including detention conditions. Some improvements have been made in the Kętrzyn detention facility (for families with children and persons with disabilities), where the window bars were removed and 'safe windows' were installed, the Headquarters of the Border Guard stated.

Regional courts in Poland continued to fail to apply the principle of the best interests of the child when deciding on placing children in detention (either in the pre-removal or the asylum contexts) or prolonging their deprivation of liberty, even though this is expressly stipulated in Polish law, several NGOs reported.

According to the Joint Centre for Return Support, several federal states in Germany planned to build new immigration detention centres – in addition to the already nationwide existing 419 facilities for deportation custody (Ausreisegewahrsam) and deportation detention (Abschiebehaft).

In France, immigration detention largely remained prevalent, leading to the widespread pre-removal detention (up to 48 hours) of children with families. According to the Public Defender of Rights, 275 children were placed in detention in mainland France in 2017, compared to 182 in 2016. The NGO La Cimade reported that judges (e.g. courts in Toulouse and Bastia) increasingly resort to video-hearings when deciding on the legality or prolongation of immigration detention. This might raise issues regarding the right to fair trial, of which a public hearing is an essential component, the Public Defender of Rights pointed out.

The Spanish Refugee Aid Commission alleged that immigration detention is increasingly used in a systematic way in Spain – and not always as a measure of last resort but for the purpose of deterrence.

According to the Swedish police and the Red Cross, pre-removal detention facilities in Sweden were stretched to the maximum of their capacity, where access to health care and the lack of information about the reasons and the rules of detention remained issues of concern.

The National Preventive Mechanism published its annual review of detention conditions and treatment of detainees in the Netherlands. It found that persons in immigration detention were generally cared for in an adequate and conscientious manner. In December 2017, a second centre with extra supervision was opened in Hoogeveen for asylum seekers who caused disturbances in regular reception centres.

Legal, social and policy responses

Legal developments

Case law

During the reporting period, the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) and the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) decided on a number of cases relating to asylum, immigration detention, returns and visas.

Court of Justice of the European Union

Following a request for a preliminary ruling by a Finnish Supreme Administrative Court, the CJEU clarified how the consultation procedure in cases where a return decision accompanied by an entry ban is issued to a third-country national, who holds a valid residence permit issued by another Member State, should be initiated and under which conditions the return decision and entry ban can be enforced.

In a preliminary ruling requested by Germany, the CJEU explained how the Dublin Regulation must be interpreted if a person, transferred under the Dublin Regulation from one Member State to another (the responsible) Member State, returns to the first Member State without a residence permit and the Member State wants to transfer the person anew.

The CJEU ruled, in a preliminary ruling requested by a Hungarian court, that the Qualification Directive (Directive 2011/95/EU), read in the light of the right to respect for private and family life (Article 7 of the Charter), precludes the use of a psychologist's expert report based on projective personality tests to indicate the sexual orientation of an applicant for international protection.

In a preliminary ruling requested by the Polish Supreme Administrative Court, the CJEU ruled that Member States must provide for appeal procedures when authorities issue a decision refusing a visa under the Visa Code, including the possibility for a judicial appeal at a certain stage of proceedings.

European Court of Human Rights

The ECtHR held that Bulgaria violated the prohibition of inhuman and degrading treatment (Article 3 ECHR) by detaining three accompanied migrant children for a brief time period in a border police's detention facility, which had unsuitable conditions for children.

The ECtHR held that Greece violated Article 5 (2) ECHR (right to be informed promptly of the reasons for arrest) when detaining three migrants in a reception centre in Chios in order to return them to Turkey under the EU-Turkey Statement.

National courts

The Supreme Court of Croatia approved the extradition of a Kurdish national to Turkey, who filed a constitutional complaint against this decision stating that it violated his right to life, the prohibition of torture and the right to a fair trial, as Switzerland had granted him refugee status under the Geneva Convention. The Croatian Constitutional Court delayed the extradition, as it needed more time to decide on the merits due to the complexity of the case.

The Italian Constitutional Court ruled that forced returns could constitute an infringement of the right to personal freedom if adopted exclusively by the police without approval of judicial authorities.

In the Netherlands, the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State noted in a ruling that Libya could be considered a safe country to which rejected asylum seekers could be deported. It noted that the general security situation in Libya, particularly in Benghazi, was not so bad as to preclude returns.

The Regional Administrative Court in Warsaw (Poland) quashed a negative asylum decision on several accounts and ordered the authorities to start the procedure anew. The asylum authority had not considered the applicant's (a Russian national of Chechen origin) family ties in other EU Member States, and had not sufficiently addressed the statements of the applicants by simply disregarding them as not credible, in breach of administrative procedural law.

Legislation

In Austria, the new government formed of the People's Party and the Freedom Party, which took over in December, announced further restrictions in the area of asylum, especially quicker procedures and quicker removals as well as the goal of bringing persons rescued at sea to "rescue centres" outside of the EU. The new Minister of the Interior from the Freedom Party ordered the establishment of a specific border protection unit, which shall be able to establish controls and barricades at the borders within hours. Caritas expressed concerns regarding the government's plan of a "Federal Agency for Care- and Support Services" making legal counselling for asylum seekers exclusively state-provided.

The Croatian government drafted a new protocol regulating the conduct of stakeholders dealing with unaccompanied children, according to the Ministry of Demography, Family, Youth and Social Policy. The draft aims to improve the enrolment of unaccompanied children in the educational system as well as their access to healthcare.

The Danish Parliament adopted an amendment to the Danish Aliens Act, restricting permanent residence permits for foreigners who actively opposed the clarification of their identity while applying for a residence permit. In line with another adopted amendment, the Minister for Immigration and Integration will regulate on an annual basis the number of United Nations refugee resettlement quotas, making the procedure more flexible.

The government in France prepared a new bill "for a guaranteed right to asylum and managed immigration", to be adopted in the first half of 2018. Amongst others, it aims to introduce the "safe third country" concept into French law. The National Consultative Commission for Human Rights severely criticised this plan, especially for creating a new scenario of excluding applicants from international protection and being contrary to the right to an effective remedy (it would shift the burden of proof to the applicant).

The potential coalition plan of the Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and the Social Democratic Party (SPD) in Germany proposes establishing central reception, decision and return centres (zentrale Aufnahme-, Entscheidungs- und Rückführungseinrichtungen, ANKER), where asylum seekers, including unaccompanied children, would be obliged to stay until their final asylum decision. Additionally, Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco, as well as other countries with a so-called low perspective to stay, are planned to be declared as safe countries of origin.

The Hungarian government prepared a draft legislative package entitled "Stop Soros", currently subject to public consultation before it is submitted to parliament. The draft aims to impose financial and other sanctions on NGOs who support 'illegal migration' using 'foreign funds' (e.g. by introducing mandatory registration, special taxes). Also, 'restraining orders' are envisaged against members of such organisations and other individuals supporting 'illegal migration' to ban their entry into the 8 km zone from Hungary's borders.

In Poland, the government prepared a draft law to amend the asylum legislation. The draft envisages, amongst others, the introduction of a border procedure and the setting up of an independent appeals commission. The legislative amendments are planned to enter into force in April 2018.

A new legislative proposal in Sweden envisages longer residence permits for unaccompanied children under certain conditions. Amnesty International voiced concerns about the proposal, since it would only cover unaccompanied children who arrived after the end of November 2015. It would also exclude a large number of children who, for other reasons, do not meet the eligibility criteria.

Policy responses

According to media reports, the new Minister of the Interior from the Freedom Party in Austria said that asylum seekers should be "concentrated" in one place. The statement sparked protests alleging that this was a reference to Nazi concentration camps.

The Ministry of Education and Science in Bulgaria approved the Bulgarian language training curricula for adult refugees and asylum seekers, as pointed out by Caritas Bulgaria.

The House of Representatives of the Dutch parliament rejected a motion calling for an end to deportations of children to Afghanistan.

The president of France announced in a public statement in mid-January that the government was going to handle the distribution of meals in Calais – this service, however, had not yet been implemented as of the end of the reporting period, according to NGOs.

In Greece, the National Commission for Human Rights issued a set of recommendations on better migration management to the government. These include the transfer of all vulnerable people to urban settings; ensuring the effective operation of the reception facilities; the immediate upgrading of the Reception and Identification and Service (RIS) with sufficient staff and resources, to enable RIS to undertake, as soon as possible, the full administration and overall management of all hotspots from the army; the urgent adoption of standard operating procedures for all reception facilities; the implementation of alternatives to detention; and reforming the guardianship system for unaccompanied children. FRA also renewed its Memorandum of Understanding with the Greek Ministry of Migration Policy on the agency's presence in Greece.

A new governmental position was created in Poland, called "Minister for humanitarian aid and refugee affairs" (minister ds. pomocy humanitarnej i spraw uchodźców), which was supposed to reflect the importance of asylum matters for the government.

Responses by civil society, local and political actors

Ten Finnish civil society organisations, including Amnesty International and the Finnish Refugee Council, have signed an appeal to stop deportations to Afghanistan. The Finnish Section of Amnesty International's open online appeal against deportations to Afghanistan is still ongoing and had gathered over 14,200 signatures as of 31 January 2018.

In Greece, mayors and residents from Lesbos, Chios and Samos protested in Athens, together with locals, against the increasingly precarious and overcrowded conditions in the hotspots. There was a push for the government to ease the migratory pressure on local communities, including the discontinuation of building additional accommodation sites on the islands.

Hate speech and violent crime

A reception centre for unaccompanied migrant children in Spinetoli (Marche), Italy was set on fire, according to media reports. The facility was still empty but was to host 37 children.

According to media reports, Krypteia, a far right group in Greece, has repeatedly threatened by phone several civil society organisations supporting asylum seekers and other migrants. The Muslim Association of Greece has also received a call from Krypteia threatening its members.

A 14-year-old girl of Turkish origin was attacked in Warsaw (Poland) due to the colour of her skin, the Ombudsman for Children's Rights reported. The police was investigating the case and the Ministry of the Interior and Administration asked the Police Chief Commander to supervise the criminal proceedings.

In Germany, attacks against refugees have increased again since July 2017, according to the Federal Criminal Police Office. From 1 December 2017 to 21 January 2018, Pro Asyl and the Amadeu Antonio Foundation recorded 13 violent attacks (e.g. with knives, stones, fists, blank cartridge pistol, slingshot) directed against asylum seekers, with at least eight injured refugees. A study of the University of Warwick detected a close connection between the number of anti-refugee and other hate speech posts on Facebook of the party Alternative für Deutschland (AfD) and the number of physical attacks against refugees and their accommodation.

In Rotterdam, the Netherlands, a demonstration against so called 'Islamisation' was held by Geert Wilders, leader of the political party PVV (Partij voor de Vrijheid) and attended by certain extreme right organisations. Messages against asylum seekers were shown and one man was arrested for yelling a racist slogan.

In Sweden, activities of right-wing extremist groups, e.g. the Nordic Resistance Movement (Nordisk motståndsrörelse), with strong anti-migrant messages were increasing, the police stated.
